

TITRE DU DOCUMENT

The key issue is this:

Courts may conclude the payments themselves were illegitimate even without proving specific manipulated matches.

That happens in corruption cases sometimes. You do not always need:

"Referee X fixed Match Y."

You may only need proof that payments were made to improperly influence a system or gain an advantage.

Still, predicting conviction confidently would be irresponsible because:

- we do not see all evidence investigators have,
- new testimony/documents could change the case,
- and high-profile sports cases often end weaker than public expectations.

So my best assessment is:

- the case is serious and unlikely to disappear quietly,
- but a dramatic "Barcelona bought referees and fixed matches" conviction is far from proven today.
